

I am in favor of telephone privacy laws, but the FCC should not implement any proposal that would reduce those that I currently enjoy under Indiana's Telephone Privacy law.

I have been relieved at not being being constantly pestered by telephone sales solicitations. In particular, my evenings are no longer disturbed by offers that I have no interest in receiving; I have never bought anything under such circumstances. The service organizations that I support through donations still have access to me through the mail, though a few still choose to call. Even this, however, has diminished without any change in my pattern of donations. This is completely acceptable given the nature and importance of their efforts.

Please do not lessen the welcome degree of privacy I've obtained under Indiana's Telephone Privacy Law.
